10 Reasons Why Having A JOB Isn't Such A Great Idea

“The world is full of willing people, some willing to work, the rest willing to let them.” – Robert Frost

The quote above can be taken a couple of different ways. My writing, here, isn't intended to criticize people who are out there working a job and loving it. This world wouldn't manage properly, if at all, without people doing those things. Not everybody can be a pop star or an astronaut or a president of a country. We need our grocery store clerks, trash collectors, mechanics, etc...

The key words above, though, are “loving it”... and don't lie to yourself. It comes down to this question: If you knew for a FACT that you could do or be whatever you wanted in life... would it be exactly what you are doing and being right now?

Hi, I'm Curt Miller - an internet entrepreneur. I started reading motivational books when I was about 14 years old and I'll tell you... there's no telling where I'd be right now without getting some awesome, killer ideas embedded into my brain. People all around me were/are living their lives in fear and they gave-up on their dreams a long, long time ago.

My dreams were certainly bigger than anybody I knew... and I'd rather be dead or in jail than to NOT be pursuing my goals each day. Here I am, living in the “free world” while watching people be literally trading HOURS of their LIVES for dollar bills. That isn't “living”.. that is being in survival mode.

Like many things that the masses do - just because everyone does it - it doesn't mean it's a good idea. In fact, if you're reasonably intelligent, getting a job is one of the worst things you can do to support yourself. Becoming an “indentured servant” is NOT the way to go... there are far better ways to make a living!!

My ideas, here, aren't for everybody. I DO believe, though, that a whole LOT of people will resonate with this!! Most people have a tendency to complain about their job every now and then. None of the people that I know would rather be spending time in the conventional workplace instead of, say, at the beach or in the mountains camping!!

At an early age I would estimate that almost everybody is taught that once they get big/old enough that it is time to go out into the world and be like everybody else who is “normal”... and GET A JOB. Depending on your upbringing it could be after you graduate college, finish high school... or even before that (especially if you want things that cost money that your parents don't want to spend).

From off the top of my head... here are some questions you might want to ask yourself if you still work a J.O.B. (Just Over Broke)

1. Why trade TIME for MONEY?

Getting a job and trading your time for money might seem like a good idea but there IS one problem with it. It's NOT very smart! In fact, It's the most un-sensical (is that a word?!) way that you could possibly generate an income! There truly should be a book called "Income For Dummies" that all of the 9 to 5 slave-grinding JOBS can be placed into.

You may ask "What is wrong with working a job?" Well, the answer for this is simple - you only get paid when you're working. There is a HUGE problem there, for me. I hope you're not too far gone to see it. Those who believe that you should only earn income while literally on the job have been brainwashed. Don't worry, though... that sick mentality was passed-on to even the best of us.

Imagine getting paid while you were eating, sleeping, and playing with the kids too? Why not get paid 24/7, around the clock? Get paid whether you work or not. Your plants grow even when you aren't tending to them, right? Why not your bank account?

Don't take this personal... but probably only a handful of people on this entire planet care how much time you spend at your job. Most people won't even notice whether you're working 6 hours a week or 60. But if you have something of value to provide that matters to us, a number of us will be happy to pull out our wallets and pay you for it. We don't care about your time — we only care enough to pay for the value we receive. Do you really care how long it took me to write this E-book? Would you pay me twice as much if it took me 4 hours vs. only 2?

Don't get me wrong, as non-dummies often start out on this very same traditional income for dummies path. So don't feel bad if you're just now realizing you've been suckered. Non-dummies eventually realize that trading time for money is indeed extremely dumb and that there must be a better way. And of course there is a better way. The key is to de-couple your value from your time.

Smart people build systems that will generate income for them 24/7, no matter what time or what day it is. This can include starting a business, building a web site, becoming an investor, or generating royalty income from their own creative work. The system delivers the ongoing value to people and generates income from it, and once it's in motion, it runs continuously whether you tend to it or not. From that moment on, the bulk of your time can be invested in increasing your income (by refining your system or spawning new ones) instead of merely maintaining your income.

This tiny e-book is an example of such a system. At this very moment, it is being marketed, building me a list of prospects/customers/contacts AND generating profits for me... while I'm off somewhere doing something different. I can write something like this just once (fixed time investment), and people can extract value from it year after year. The web server delivers the value to people's computers by allowing them to download it, people end-up going to my site and other systems (none of which I built and don't even understand - or care to!) collect income from various programs I do on the internet and deposit it automatically into my bank account.

Sure it takes SOME upfront time and effort to design and implement your own income-generating systems - but it doesn't have to take A LOT! You don't have to reinvent the wheel — in fact, I will show you the quickest way to Kick Your Job in the rear and never look back!!

Once you get going, you won't have to work so many hours to support yourself. Eventually – the leverage that you create will make it seem like you are living a vacation lifestyle. Wouldn't it be nice to be out having dinner with your spouse, knowing that while you're eating, you're earning money? If you want to keep working long hours because you enjoy it, your choice!! If you want to sit around doing nothing... again, feel free!! As long as your system continues delivering value to others, you'll keep getting paid whether you're working or not.

Your local bookstore is filled with books containing workable systems others have already designed, tested, and debugged. Nobody is born knowing how to start a business or generate investment income, but you can easily learn it. How long it takes you to figure it out is irrelevant because the time is going to pass anyway. You might as well emerge at some future point as the owner of income-generating systems as opposed to a lifelong wage slave. This isn't all or nothing. If your system only generates a few hundred dollars a month, that's a significant step in the right direction.

2. Why get experience at things you don't REALLY want to do?

Many think it's very important - and that there's a huge benefit to - getting a job to gain experience. That is like saying you should play golf to get more experience playing golf. You gain experience simply from living each day - regardless of whether or not you have a job. A job will only give you experience at that particular job, but you gain "experience" doing just about anything, so that's no real benefit at all. Sit around doing nothing for a couple years, and you can call yourself an experienced meditator, philosopher, or even a politician.

The problem with getting experience from a job is that you usually just repeat the same limited experience over and over. You might learn a lot in the beginning and then it begins to get stagnant. This forces you to miss other experiences that would be much more valuable. And if your limited skill set should ever become obsolete, then your experience won't be worth squat. In fact, ask yourself what the experience you're gaining right now will be worth in 20 to 30 years. Will your job even exist then?

Consider this. Which experience would you rather gain? The knowledge of how to do a specific job really well — one that you can only monetize by trading your time for money — or the knowledge of how to enjoy financial abundance for the rest of your life without ever needing a job again? Now I don't know about you, but I'd MUCH rather have the latter experience. That seems a lot more useful in the real world, wouldn't you say?

3. Why live a life of domestication?

Getting a job is a lot like enrolling in a human domestication program. You learn how to be a good pet. Don't get me wrong.. pets are cute... to look at or to hold... but not to live like one!!

Look around you. I mean REALLY look. What do you see? Are these the surroundings of a free human being? Or are you living in a cage for unconscious animals? Have you fallen in love with the color beige?

How's your obedience training coming along? Does your master reward your good behavior? Do you get disciplined if you fail to obey your master's commands?

Is there any spark of free will left inside you? Or has your conditioning made you a pet for life?

Humans are not meant to be raised in cages. You poor thing... let's get you out of there!!

4. Why be at the BOTTOM of the "feeding" hierarchy?

Employee income is the most heavily taxed income that exists. In the USA you can expect that about 1/2 of your salary will go to taxes. The tax system is designed to disguise how much you're really giving up because some of those taxes are paid by your employer, and some are deducted from your paycheck. But you can bet that from your employer's perspective, all of those taxes are considered part of your pay, as well as any other compensation you receive such as benefits. Even the rent for the office space you consume is considered, so you must generate that much more value to cover it. You might feel supported by your corporate environment, but keep in mind that you're the one paying for it.

Another chunk of your income goes to owners and investors. That's a lot of mouths to feed.

It isn't hard to understand why employees pay the most in taxes relative to their income. After all, who has more control over the tax system? Business owners and investors... or employees?

You only get paid a fraction of the real value you offer to an employer. Your real salary may be more than triple what you're paid, but most of that money you'll never see. It goes straight into other people's pockets. What a generous person you are!

Working for yourself is where it's at.

5. Why do people feel it is safe to work a 9 to 5?

Many employees believe getting a job is the safest and most secure way to support themselves.

What the HECK are they thinking??

Social conditioning is amazing - it's so good it can even make people believe the exact opposite of the truth.

Does putting yourself in a position where someone else can turn off all your income just by saying 2 words ("You're fired") sound like a safe and secure situation to you? Does having only one income stream honestly sound more secure than having 10 of them?

The idea that a job is the most secure way to generate income is just silly. You can't have security if you don't have control, and employees have the least control of anyone. If you're an employee, then your real job title should be professional gambler.

6. Why Be Somebody's Servant?

It doesn't matter how much smarter you might be than your boss(es).. they have hired you primarily for one reason; to carry out their wishes. If you are an administrative assistant, then your duty is to perform clerical work (like photocopying, faxing, and typing 85,000 wpm) at the behest of a superior. If you are an agent in global licensing, then your job is to secure deals with your products with other companies... at the behest of a superior. Even if you are a junior attorney or a paralegal, those partners will be tossing into your direction all of the work that they don't feel like doing, themselves – but will still bill their clients for THEIR time, anyway!!

Basically, in today's world of traditional 9 to 5 employment, you have little option but to be the simple servant of another power until you are in your 50's. At that point, you might be given a break and put into an alpha role – but don't count on it – as most "higher-ups" in a business are still the servants of other higher-ups. When you come across an idiot in the entrepreneurial world, you can turn around and head the other way. When you come across an idiot in the corporate world, you have to turn around and say, "Sorry, boss."

7. Why have to beg for money?

When you want to increase your income, do you have to sit up and beg your master for more money? Or work more hours? Does it feel good to be thrown some extra Scooby Snacks now and then?

Or are you free to decide how much and how often you get paid without needing anyone's permission but your own?

If you have a business and one customer says "no" to you, you can simply say "next." To me, that's living! You get to write your own checks... or bank transfers...

8. Why live an inbred social life?

Many people treat their jobs as their primary social outlet. They hang out with the same people working in the same field. Such incestuous relations are social dead ends. An exciting day includes deep conversations about the company's switch from Sparkletts to Arrowhead, the delay of Microsoft's latest operating system, and the unexpected delivery of more Bic pens. Consider what it would be like to go outside and talk to strangers. Ooooh... scary! Better just stay inside where it's safe.

If one of your co-slaves gets sold to another master, do you lose a friend? If you work in a male-dominated field, does that mean you never get to talk to women above the rank of receptionist? Why not decide for yourself whom to socialize with instead of letting your master decide for you? Believe it or not, there are locations on this planet where free people congregate. Just be wary of those jobless folk — they're a crazy bunch!

9. WHY be a coward?

Have you noticed that employed people have an almost endless capacity to whine about problems at their companies? They aren't really looking for solutions, though — they just want to vent and make excuses why it's all someone else's fault. It's as if getting a job somehow drains all the free will out of people and turns them into spineless cowards. If you can't call your boss a jerk now and then without fear of getting fired, you're no longer free. You've become your master's property.

When you work around cowards all day long, don't you think it's going to rub off on you? Of course it will. It's only a matter of time before you sacrifice the noblest parts of your humanity on the altar of fear: first courage... then honesty... then honor and integrity... and finally your independent will. You sold your humanity for nothing but an illusion. And now your greatest fear is discovering the truth of what you've become.

I don't care how badly you've been beaten down. It is never too late to regain your courage. Never! You could, today, take the bull by the horns and get your life back.

10. Why not have TOTAL freedom?

It takes a lot of effort to tame a human being into an employee. The first thing you have to do is break the human's independent will. A good way to do this is to give them a weighty policy manual filled with nonsensical rules and regulations. This leads the new employee to become more obedient, fearing that s/he could be disciplined at any minute for something incomprehensible. Thus, the employee will likely conclude it's safest to simply obey the master's commands without question. Stir in some office politics for good measure, and we've got a freshly minted mind slave.

As part of their obedience training, employees must be taught how to dress, talk, move, and so on. We can't very well have employees thinking for themselves, now can we? That would ruin everything.

God forbid you should put a plant on your desk when it's against the company policy. Oh no, it's the end of the world! Cindy has a plant on her desk! Summon the enforcers! Send Cindy back for another round of sterility training!

Free human beings think such rules and regulations are silly, of course. The only policy they need is: "Be smart. Be nice. Do what you love. Have fun."

Do you STILL want a job?

If you're currently a well-conditioned, well-behaved employee, your most likely reaction to the above will be defensiveness. It's all part of the conditioning. But consider that if the above didn't have a grain of truth to it, you wouldn't have an emotional reaction at all. This is only a reminder of what you already know. You can deny your cage all you want, but the cage is still there. Perhaps this all happened so gradually that you never noticed it until now... like a lobster enjoying a nice warm bath.

If any of this makes you mad, that's a step in the right direction. Anger is a higher level of consciousness than apathy, so it's a lot better than being numb all the time. Any emotion — even confusion — is better than apathy. If you work through your feelings instead of repressing them, you'll soon emerge on the doorstep of courage. And when that happens, you'll have the will to actually do something about your situation and start living like the powerful human being you were meant to be instead of the domesticated pet you've been trained to be.

What?? But you LIKE your J.O.B??

Ok - I won't flat-out say that you are lying to me. It is possible that you DO believe that.. or at least WANT TO believe that.

To anybody out there that says "I don't mind going to work each day at my job", I have a litmus test for you. Here is your litmus test: If you DID NOT NEED the money that your job pays you to show up and work there each day – yet, you would STILL GO TO WORK... THEN you could say that you actually like and enjoy your job.

MANY, MANY people out there are “Happily Jobless”

On several different occasions - after talking to people about freedom and working from home you wouldn't believe some of the stuff that I hear! Some people actually tell me “I would go crazy NOT having something to do!” OR they say “I'd hate being stuck in the house all day”.

Having the freedom to not have to go to work, the term we refer to as “working from home” does not mean that you have to be “stuck” at your house. It simply means that you don't have to get up and go punch a clock all day for somebody else. You can be out there on the beach or in the mountains or in another country!! Also, if you'd have a problem finding something to do with yourself if your boss wasn't there to give you orders... then maybe you deserve to keep working that J.O.B.

What's the alternative to getting a job? That is an easy one!! The alternative is to remain happily jobless for life and to generate income through other means. Realize that you earn income by providing value — not time — so find a way to provide your best value to others, and charge a fair price for it. One of the simplest and most accessible ways is to start your own business. Whatever work you'd otherwise do via employment, find a way to provide that same value directly to those who will benefit most from it. It takes a bit more time to get going, but your freedom is easily worth the initial investment of time and energy. Then you can buy your own Scooby Snacks for a change.

And of course everything you learn along the way, you can share with others to generate even more value. Yes!! Even your mistakes can be monetized!!

One of the greatest fears you'll confront is that you may not have any real value to offer others. Maybe being an employee and getting paid by the hour is the best you can do. Maybe you just aren't worth that much. That line of thinking is all just part of your conditioning. It's absolute nonsense. As you begin to dump such brainwashing, you'll soon recognize that you have the ability to provide enormous value to others and that people will gladly pay you for it. There's only one thing that prevents you from seeing this truth — fear.

Have the courage to be yourself... that is all you really need. A person's real value is rooted in who they are, not what they do. The only thing you actually need to do is express the real you to the world. You've been told all sorts of lies as to why you can't do that. But you'll never know true happiness and fulfillment until you summon the courage to do it anyway.

The next time someone says to you, “Get a job,” I suggest you reply as Curly did: “No, please... not that! Anything but that!” Then poke him right in the eyes. (kidding!)

You probably already know deep down that getting a job isn't what you want. So don't let anyone try to convince you otherwise. Learn to trust your inner wisdom, even if the whole world says you're wrong and foolish for doing so. Years from now you'll look back and realize it was one of the best decisions you ever made.

Final thoughts

Starting an online business isn't for everyone out there, but for many people it's one of the best ways to generate income without a job. It is certainly working well for me.
